The defendants are being tried at Guantanamo Bay for committing war crimes as part of an ongoing “war” on terror waged by the United States. It is hoped that their “war crimes” will serve as some sort of model or path for future prosecution. However, their “model” is probably not the one the Obama Administration was actually following. The Obama Administration is not allowing the defendants to be brought to trial by a jury. Instead, they are using a “star chamber” — a kangaroo court — which is rife with various abuse, mistreatment, and manipulation. In fact, the abuse that these defendants have suffered at the hand of U.S. military and civilian personnel in court is almost beyond comprehension. While we hear of the beatings and death threats that the U.S. has wielded against the defendants, the most disturbing and shameful treatment that they have received is that their case has been taken away from them by military tribunals. If the Obama Administration is following the Geneva Conventions, it should follow the accepted practice of allowing the prisoners to be tried in a civilian court. The United States has gone through several different tribunals that are given the authority to try prisoners, and each has served the higher purpose of keeping the prisoners at Guantanamo Bay. However, these tribunals have only been effective in keeping the prisoners there for a limited amount of time. The trials are frustrating and are tiring for both the administration and the prisoners. In fact, this is so obvious
