Numerous recent advances in neonatal extracorporeal membrane oxygenation (ECMO) technology have increased the number of patients surviving ECMO. However, reporting the successful use of neonatal ECMO in the pediatric population is a challenge. This survey attempts to determine current practices for pediatric ECMO support. An 11-question survey was mailed to all neonatology fellows, cardiothoracic surgery fellows, and pediatric critical care medicine fellows at 21 American medical schools. Specific questions focused on current and future ECMO utilization in pediatrics, current ECMO technology, and potential changes in practice to optimize pediatric ECMO. Seventy-six percent of the 462 survey respondents work in a center that currently supports pediatric ECMO. A neonatal cardiopulmonary bypass (CPB) circuit is currently in place in 95% of ECMO centers that support neonates, with pediatric-size hollow-fiber membrane oxygenators in 55% of centers. Sixty-four percent of centers support open-heart surgery when instituted in the preoperative setting. Fraction of inspired oxygen and ECMO flow rate are reduced when instituted for the postoperative setting. More than 60% of centers restrict maintenance ECMO to 1-10 d. Ninety-three percent of centers wait for at least 24 h to change the ventilator to a non-ECMO ventilator. Interruption of standard parenteral nutrition is considered off-label in 19% of centers. We are reporting the most recent trends in the current pediatric ECMO practice at centers with pediatric ECMO experience. The recent advances in technology for ECMO have allowed more patients to survive at centers with less experience in ECMO.So, what is different with the SATA SSD 550 from OCZ? It
