Abnormal metabolism of glutamate in the striatum of transgenic mice with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis. The pathogenesis of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS) is poorly understood and toxic free radical theories of the disease are controversial. Therefore, the pathophysiology of ALS, in particular, the metabolic defects that lead to loss of central nervous system function, need to be investigated. Glutamatergic neurotransmission is affected in ALS, and we have found abnormalities in the glutamatergic system, such as glutamate, glutamine, and gamma-aminobutyric acid, in the corticostriatal pathway of a transgenic mouse model of ALS. In this report, we show that glutamate is increased and glutamate transporter function is decreased in the striatum of transgenic mice. These results indicate that the metabolism of glutamate is abnormal in the striatum in ALS.
