Research suggests that repeated exposure to traumatic events increases the likelihood of neurocognitive deficits in adult populations. However, little is known about how such exposure may influence the development of the brain in adolescence. The current study compared the cognitive abilities of adolescents who experienced repeated exposure to a trauma (n = 38; M = 15.96, SD = 1.45) to those of adolescents who had only a single exposure (n = 30; M = 15.58, SD = 1.56). Participants were between the ages of 11 and 18 and were receiving psychiatric treatment at a hospital setting. A neuropsychological battery was administered to each participant, and the results were compared to normative data collected from healthy adolescents. Results showed that the trauma group demonstrated significantly worse performance on tasks of working memory and visual scanning. Moreover, trauma group participants' responses on these tasks were significantly more variable, and they made more commission errors than did controls on these tasks. These results suggest that repeated exposure to traumatic events may be associated with significant cognitive deficits among adolescents. Further research is necessary to examine the influence of chronic trauma exposure on cognitive functioning in young adults. Computers Can See Better Than Your Dog - tjr ====== debacle I'm skeptical of this. Also, dogs have poor depth perception. ------ jokermatt999 Bummer. If I could afford it, I'd get a dog and teach it to hack the retina camera. :) ~~~ gjm11 No, you can't do that. It's one of the reasons you can't get a retina camera that does what an eye does. ~~~ vacri Yet? The goal of this study was to evaluate the effects of sensory manipulations on children's declarative memory. We manipulated the visual and haptic modality, and the modality of a meaningful semantic-related item and used an item-dependent paradigm in order to test the effects of modality manipulations on declarative memory in three experiments. Three groups of children aged between 7 and 9 years were presented with a series of picture pairs (item pairings) representing a semantic category (animals or food) and were asked to recall a single picture (target item) from each pair. In the first experiment, children learned the semantic category of each item pair and, subsequently, we presented a target item from one of the two
