This is pretty much how the FUT game modes work, and as usual EA Sports is touting this as an improvement. Unlike FIFA 18, where you'd have to swap out a player's data manually and was clearly a real chore, this is now a much more involved process and allows you to make dramatic changes to players' stats. As for the "Better Control" aspect, it's not exactly sure how it will work, but EA Sports certainly wants to make it a feature rather than a new option. As such, they say it will be used in the main menu, to select control schemes, and on-the-fly. FIFA 17 introduced game modes, including FUT Draft Mode, FUT Champions League and FUT International, which let you play the game modes with up to 10 other players. EA is promising that it's going to be different than how you've played the modes previously, and they'll have more details at E3. (It's worth noting that FIFA 18 had those game modes as well and they were seemingly very similar to one another, except Draft Mode was a turn-based mode and Champions League had a real-time component.) Finally, FIFA is also planning on adding support for 64-player matches in FIFA Ultimate Team, with PES bringing it to 64 last year. They're saying Fifa 22 Cracked 2022 Latest Version will have an online 64-player mode along with single-player and offline options. They're also promising new player packs including Xbox One, PS4 and PC users, along with new content like "Battle mode and new leagues." In addition to the sports and game modes, FIFA 22 will see new stadiums, new leagues and content, new sets and helmets. It will also have new animations and player likenesses and goalkeepers will now be able to adopt a defensive stance with a free kick. For real-time plays like headers or corner kicks, goalkeepers can now dive. Full details can be found on EA Sports's FAQ. A full run down of the new content, features and modes can be found on the FIFA 22 website. FIFA 22 is due on October 2nd.
