Each player is assigned with one of the 8 available characters. Each round, each player can either pick a character or pick none. I would like to split this into a decision-tree with conditional decisions in order to prevent large scale slow down caused by a feature which always takes the same amount of time to execute. Is there a good practice for this? A: There are different approaches to this. I hope the following examples will help you, but please let me know if they are not sufficient, I will update them, if necessary. First things first: Each game takes $N*(M+C)$ time, where N is the number of players, M is the number of rounds, and C is the number of character changes for the current round. To mitigate the impact of this, C should ideally be small (often 1). For each round, each player can choose between 1 and M number of characters. If the player chooses all of them, C is equal to M . If the player chooses none, C is equal to 0. The case with one round per player: So here, C is equal to 1. C is further reduced for the cases with multiple players: This player (Player 0) can choose between 1 and $N-1$ characters. This character (Character 0) and this player (Player 1) can choose between 1 and $N-2$ characters. The case with multiple rounds per player: So here, C is equal to M . C is reduced for the cases with multiple rounds: Player 0 can choose between 1 and $M-1$ rounds. This rounds, each player can choose between 1 and $M-1$ characters. Having this in mind, you can go for an approach which first decides if the player chooses none. If the player chooses none, you can decide between rounds, and if the player chooses one, you can decide between players, i.e.: | Rounds | Players | | | ----- | ----- | | | 1 | N | | | 3 | N, N, N | | | 9 b7e8fdf5c8
