Export to PDF.The U.S. Postal Service hopes to avoid a double-dip recession as it deals with a backlog of packages and slows in its customer base in the days leading up to Christmas. Now, the agency is once again falling in line with regular carriers, like FedEx, and cutting an opening for a better holiday season. The APWU, which represents 200,000 delivery workers, is pushing for a two-tiered system, according to a letter it submitted to Congress this week. The postal service would offer nationwide deliveries and, in the absence of an existing carrier, turn to a private firm that would make last-mile deliveries in residential and business areas. This would allow the USPS to leverage the logistics of a

The following code generates an error saying: error: cannot convert 'std::vector {aka std::vector}' to 'double* {aka double*}' in assignment int arr = (int)malloc(sizeof(int)*m); assert(arr!= NULL); //Create an array of int and store its values But if I remove the cast after malloc then there is no error. Why is the cast necessary and how can I get rid of it? A: You do have a pointer returned from malloc(sizeof(int)) and you want to assign it to an array of int. Try using: int arr = (int)malloc(sizeof(int*)); And then: arr = (int*)malloc(sizeof(int)*m); assert(arr!= NULL); Alternatively, you could make an array of pointers in the first place, and then do arr = malloc(sizeof(int) * m); Influence of external ventricular drainage in paraventricular arteriovenous malformation treatment. Although arteriovenous malformations of the brain are one of the most frequent benign tumors, therapeutic management still poses a challenge for neurosurgeons.
